

to combat

depression characterized by

"chronic fatigue"

Depressed patients "... suffering from psychomotor inhibition complain of feeling tired, of not being able to get started on their daily tasks, and of an abnormal inclination to procrastinate. They make up their minds that they are going to do a certain thing but they never seem to get to it. Everything seems too big for them . . ."*

In the above quotation, Kamman emphasizes "chronic fatigue" as a dominant symptom in the type of depression most frequently encountered in daily practice.

Benzedrine Sulfate is particularly valuable in the presence of "chronic fatigue". It will, in most cases, help to overcome the depression and thus enable the patient to make a sincere and constructive effort to surmount his difficulties.
